A little west of the railway, at Lin-shin-pu, the Sha-ho, which is a small stream, takes a decided bend south-west, eventually joining the Tai-tze-ho. Crossing the Hun-ho the Russians had a position at Zifonti, their outposts extending north and west to the Liao-ho at Sinminting. This historic book may have numerous typos and missing text.

Between them and the railway was Grippenbergs Second Manchurian Army, with its headquarters at Zifonti; Kaulbars held the centre, and Linievitch the east. Leaving the Sha-ho at this bend the Russian lines struck across country to the Hun-ho, the large affluent of the Liao-ho, which after passing Mukden flows south and west.

From Linievitch's or the First Manchurian Army the well-trying 1st Siberian Army Corps under Baron Stackelberg had been sent to strengthen Grippenberg's army, which consisted largely of European corps. Thus the Russian lines were in the shape of a bow, with Mukden behind and equidistant from the two ends. At this period the force under General Kuropatkin's command was some 400,000 strong, and had about 2000 guns.
