The East Indian: A Comedy, in Five Acts, as Performed at the Theatre

I am grieved at thinking what may be the event of this connection. Your words pierce through my soul! Sir Harry has nothing to boast of; we may therefore depend on his silence; and I have too good an opinion of Sir William Belville, to suppose him capable of ever mentioning it; and I would not have your ladyship seem to know one word of the matter. I am extremely unhappy, madam, to find that the most important concern of my life should be come a matter of ridicule and mirth to you.

As the situation of Harriet would not admit of any change, I have not attempted to deviate from the gentle, and into resting Eugenie, of Monsieur Beaumarchais. Why faith, mademoiselle, I find myself a little disconcerted too, at present, and have a foreboding sufficient to deter another man from the attempt, but I am determined to proceed, in spite of qualms, either of my conscience, or her virtue—This night puts an end to my life, or my misfortunes. What a mean light, do I appear in, at this moment, to myself! Help me to my chair, 'tis at the park gate, my wound grows painful, and the walks begin to fill.

But persons of quality, my dear, never presume to rebel against the laws of subordination—But this is a political secret, which you are yet ignorant of, child.

In the repose, rather than tumult of the soul. My dear Lady Frankland, joy, like mine, is not to be restrained by common forms—Lucy this moment told me she saw Lord Frankland come into your dressing room, and though perhaps, I interrupt your happiness, I must indulge my own, by wishing to you both, that true felicity which I well know you both deserve. This sure is bliss, if bliss on earth there be—Heigh ho! I fancy he likes the girl, himself.
