The young author's first poems began to be read in Parisian literary circles around 1895, and they were appreciated for their fresh tone which broke considerably from tendencies of the period.

I shall arrive, followed by their thousands of ears, Followed by those with baskets at their flanks, By those who lug the carts of mountebanks Or loads of feather-dusters and kitchen-wares, By those with humps of battered water-cans, By bottle-shaped she-asses who halt and stumble, By those tricked out in little pantaloons To cover their wet, blue galls where flies assemble In whirling swarms, making a drunken hum. I have spoken with the voice you gave me and written with the words You taught my parents, who taught me. And then, thanks In the mountain villages of the remote French Basque Country in the early years of the twentieth century, Francis Jammes was writing poems, plays, and novels.

On the south side of the Pyrenees in Spanish Catalonia, Picasso was painting his portraits in pink and blue; on the north side in French Catalonia, Maillol was starting to sculpt strong bronze women; while near the Mediterranean, arthritic old Renoir was absorbed in his voluptuous female bathers; and to the north, Monet was designing the sumptuous Giverny gardens he would be painting for decades.

We would hear nothing but the heat of the sun. Interestingly, the traditional French devotion does not, like its English counterpart Hail Mary, follow the short Latin greeting, Ave Maria, but rather the ancient incantational form of its root-language Sanskrit: a full sentence in the first person. In 1895, twenty-six year old Francis Jammes journeyed for the first time to Paris, where he met a variety of artists including the painter Eugène Carrière.

Catholicism had entered into my life. In Les géorgiques chrétiennes, Jammes turns his attention to the spiritual life of a country family. Flowers, forests, women - he was in love with all that Lived.

And late one night in the beginning of the twenty-first century, I found myself in Paris, prowling the bookstores of the Place Saint Germain, gathering volumes of Francis Jammes for a new translation. I was very glad to read this volume, but as a vehicle for getting to know Jammes better, it fails in two signal ways, both related to the presentation of his writing. In the following year the poet wrote From Always to Forever De Tout Temps à Jamais , and Springs Sources , ten decasyllabic ten-line poems in honor of ten sacred springs.
