Marxist Theory in Japan: A Critical Overview

The concept of regional market has thus become an important link between globalization and localization. Before further discussion of the case of Manchuria, it will be helpful to outline the general contours of twentieth-century emigration from Japan. A fairly simple calculation underlay the target figure of one million emigrant households: at an average of 5 family members per household, that was the number needed to insure that 10 per cent of the population in Manchuria, which was projected to reach fifty million at the end of twenty years, would be Japanese.

The following points deserve attention. In the light of previous experience and in response to the various conditions put forward by the recipient countries, the training period has been shortened in cases where a new plant is being established so that local operations can begin relatively sooner, followed by more efficient production methods. At the same time, one of the striking features of the 1990s is the gradual emergence of a regional production system centring on Japan for details, see Bernard and Ravenhill 1995.

Later attempts by the government to promote emigration to Manchuria, in particular the plan announced in 1936 to send one million Japanese farm households there over a twenty-year period, were carried out as part of this campaign. Of crucial significance is the degree to which the transfer to local production has taken place in the overseas expansion and development stage of automobile production.
