Clara Hopgood, by Mark Rutherford

The creature was dazed, it stopped and staggered, and in another instant Frank was across the bridge in safety. As the customer showed no signs of departing, Cohen left, saying he would call again. Partly, at least, it was the voice of what he considered to be duty, of superstition and alarm.

Eliza Lynn Linton's "The Autobiography of Christopher Kirkland"

I know most of the folk hereabouts.

Clara Hopgood

She did not withdraw; he clasped the hand, she not resisting; in another moment his arms were round her, his face was on hers, and he was swept into self-forgetfulness. I am sure that no ordinary woman ever shows what she really is, except when she is in love.

Clara Hopgood by Mark Rutherford Paperback

Maybe, sir, them premises at the farm are also unbeknown to you. She took his hand softly in hers.

He was obliged to be there for three or four days before the entertainment, in order to attend the rehearsals, which Mrs Martin had put under the control of a professional gentleman from London, and Madge and he were consequently compelled to make frequent journeys to the Hall. In London nobody really cares for anybody, at least, not in the sense in which I should use the words. The next morning she ought to have lain in bed, but she came down at her accustomed hour as Mrs Cork was more than usually disagreeable, and it was settled that they would leave at once if the rooms in Great Ormond Street were available.

Clara Hopgood

Fenmarket pronounced her 'stuck-up,' and having thus labelled her, considered it had exhausted her. This was Love; this was the blessing which the god with the ruddy wings had bestowed on him.
