Chappaquiddick: True Facts of the Kennedy Story Behind Movie

A submerged car was found off a bridge in a remote part of an island with the body of a drowned young woman Mary Jo Kopechne, a Kennedy worker in it. After prolonged negotiations during 1989 with Bush chief of staff and Attorney General to secure Bush's approval, he directed passage of the landmark.

Kennedy gets the minimum sentence by pleading guilty to leaving the scene of an accident: two months jail time, which the judge suspends based on Kennedy's character and good standing. The three men subsequently crossed back to Chappaquiddick Island on the ferry, where Kennedy made a series of phone calls from a payphone by the crossing to his friends for advice; he again did not report the accident to authorities.

Back at his hotel, Kennedy complained at 2:55 am to the hotel owner that he had been awoken by a noisy party. The incident and its aftermath hindered his chances of ever becoming president. A deputy sheriff later testified that he saw Kennedy's car on Dyke Road at 12:40 am, and that the driver sped off when he approached it.
