Separated into ten panels by intermediate verticals of laced heavy channels, the truss consists of a two-panel center section with the top chord parallel to the bottom one and crossed diagonals within the panels, a two-panel side section with crossed diagonals in the panel adjacent to the center section, and a single panel section next to the inclined endpost. The Hutsonville Bridge or Sullivan-Hutsonville Bridge connecting Crawford County, Illinois, and Sullivan County, Indiana, over the Wabash River, built and replaced in was an example of the relatively rare self-anchored suspension bridge type. Software An illustration of two photographs.
