The tender husband and father seemed to wish to live for his dear ones, and the devoted pastor longed to labour on for his Master; but every such wish was qualified with the language, 'The cup that my Father giveth me, shall I not drink it? The seed which they sowed in troublous times, and which they watered with their tears, has, under the divine blessing, grown up a goodly tree, and prospered, until its branches are spreading out and overshadowing this fair land! Without wandering, or wavering, or hesitating, he continued his utterances as long as his strength permitted. . Like all of us, he had some idea about death; but it was not realized.

William Neill, and subsequently of the Rev. More than once, in confidential Christian interchanges with him, he would speak with tears of the unfruitfulness of his ministry and the unprofitableness of his life. Many of these preaching-expeditions were made wholly or in part on foot, and often in the night, regardless of the injurious effect of the night-air upon his hearing.

They were prayerful and holy men. He was a cheerful Christian; and his extensive reading, his unfailing memory, his exhaustless fund of anecdote, his sparkling wit, his lively but always barbless repartee, all chastened by the most considerate Christian propriety, gave a charm to his conversation that made it ever coveted. State of Ulster during the Reigns of James I.
