Woodblock printing

Barmer is known for its prints of red chillies and trees featuring a blue-black outline, while Sikar and Shekhawat prints feature motifs of horses, camels, peacocks and lions. Certain forms of hand block-printing make use of natural and vegetable dyes, setting this printing technique apart from the rest.

Fine details are very difficult to cut in wood, and, even when successfully cut, wear down very rapidly or break off in printing. The more intricate the carved design the more it demonstrates the accomplished pattern carver. The portions to be left in relief are then tinted, between their outlines, an ammoniacal carmine or magenta, for the purpose of distinguishing them from those portions that have to be cut away.

Block Printing

The difference between East Asian wood block printing and the Western printing press had major implications for the development of book culture and book markets in East Asia and Europe.

Block Printing and the Process Behind It

Using a brayer ink roller, mix the ink on a glass plate according to any listed instructions to get the consistency right for printmaking. The block is then dipped into the dye and pressed onto the fabric and bashed quickly and firmly to ensure even coverage. Over the years, artisans have improvised designs and motifs, as well as the blocks and colors that are used.

Block Printing Colour / Black

The lives of the Indian textile craftspeople the khadi, chhipa, dhobi and rangrez are an interwoven system of functions, castes and religious communities. When large masses of colour occur in a pattern, the corresponding parts on the block are usually cut in outline, the object being filled in between the outlines with felt, which not only absorbs the colour better, but gives a much more even impression than it is possible to obtain with a large surface of wood.

The last technique of discharge printing, on the other hand, sees the use of chemicals to remove portions from dyed fabric which are then filled in with different colours. British designers of the 1800s found inspiration in Indian floral motifs, of which the Paisley pattern remains commonly loved.
