Kitaro Nishida

The boundaries between learning, art, craft, and technique were a modern product of the late nineteenth century. After returning the original anti-Christian shogunal proclamations to the sociopolitical context of their creation, and in particular reminding ourselves of the immediate factional political motivations of the ban on Christianity as part of a move against the Toyotomi in the mid-1610s, the Early Tokugawa anti-Christian discourse 77 chapter then proceeded to re-evaluate the populist anti-Christian writings of the mid-seventeenth century which make up the bulk of the canon.
