Holderlin

From August 1806 and for the next thirty-six years he lived in a private house in Tübingen, where he was looked after, left to do as he wished and treated understandingly; his emotional equilibrium, at least, improved; he played the piano, wrote simple poems, made literary plans that could not materialize, received occasional visitors. Treatment enabled him to continue writing at intervals while working as a librarian in Homburg until 1807 when he became insane though harmless. Asistió a clases impartidas por , y Schiller le publicó un fragmento del Hiperión en su revista Thalia.

The following year Hölderlin was discharged as incurable and given three years to live, but was taken in by the carpenter Ernst Zimmer a cultured man, who had read Hyperion and given a room in his house in Tübingen, which had been a tower in the old city wall with a view across the river. During that period, Hölderlin was a staunch supporter of the French Revolution, which was seen by many German intellectuals as a source of hope for the future. The poetry of Hölderlin, widely recognized today as one of the highest points of German literature, was little known or understood during his lifetime and slipped into obscurity shortly after his death; his ill.

Poems by Friedrich Hölderlin in English translation by David Constantine

But if somebody spurred himself on Along the road and, speaking sadly, Fell upon me and surprised me, so that Like a servant I'd make an image of the god — Once I saw the lords Of heaven visibly angered, not
 That I wanted to become something different,
 But that I wanted to learn something more.
