Ruse's accounts, which oblique references in the text seem to place in 1930, form part of his conversations with the unnamed narrator, which are set in restaurant and in the narrator's Bucharest home; this, Manolescu notes, echoes scenes in Craii. Nevertheless, the two figures were especially close to one another during and after 1915, and, in 1916, even visited Berlin together.

Many of the comments added by him to his copy of the book are polemic, sarcastic, or mysterious, while the sketches he made on the margin include portrayals of boyars being put to death in various ways, as well as such as a blazon displaying a donkey's head, which he mockingly assigned to Octav-George Lecca himself. Caragiale's Sub pecetea tainei has been the subject of debates in the literary community. In 1903, with Ion Luca, Burelly and their children, he traveled through large portions of , visiting , Switzerland, Italy and France; during the trip, he recorded the impressions left on him by the various European art trends.
