Company A, 3d Battalion, was organized May 16, and Lieut. Special pains appear to have been taken in this reorganization to prevent any continuance in the new organizations of the regimental traditions of the old, for not a single regiment of infantry retained its original number. Colonel King and Major Carpenter wrote letters in vain to the War Department asking to have these companies transferred to Tennessee to join their proper battalion, or, if it were not practicable to send them to their own battalion, to have them assigned to duty with some regular battalion in the Army of the Potomac, where they might receive proper instruction and drill.

The men were placed in the wagons and the column was given the appearance of a provision train. The organization of the companies of the 2d and 3d Battalions was continued during the spring and summer of 1866, and before July 1st the regi- 662 ment had its complement of three battalions with eight companies each, aggregating nearly two thousand men. How to protect the troops now became a serious problem.
