The California landscape is truly distinctive in its contours, coloring, foliage and atmosphere. Despite her paintings' exploration of various themes, each piece has unmistakable feeling, showing off her genuine love for art. A Nolde-like flower scene by Nick Brigante brought the German Expressionist way of seeing to Los Angeles, Max Reno painted a skeleton as a cellist bowing a female figure called Dying Vienna, and a geometric abstraction by Ben Berlin was all circles, rays, and saw-tooth patterns, quite in step with Kandinsky of the early 1920's.

This society was formed in reaction to conservative academic attitudes which restricted freer expressions and opportunities for the younger artists. Levin draws his influence from a variety of sources: the masters, photography, and the cinema. He infuses his paintings with a classical ethos going back to Titian.

There is, however, a tradition still extant amongst the old French settlers on the Bay, said to have been derived from the Indians who inhabited the coast on its first settlement by the French, that this fortification was built by a tribe of Indians long since extinct. After World War II the museum opened an education department which provided a progressive approach to teaching art to children in Southern California.
