I had acquired this noble idea of giving everything at least one chance. Once on the island, Zorba seduces Hortensia, a former French dancer, while the writer is attracted by a young and desired widow. He reminisces on the good times they had together, and admits that he loved Stavridakis very deeply.

Alongside this portrayal of mankind as a confused, self-conflicted mass of mutually contradictory lives all bound for the same place - the grave - Kazantzakis gives us a vivid picture of his native Crete early in the 20th century, how it looked, smelled and tasted, how its people lived and acted. In the early stages of the mining operation, the narrator goes with Zorba to the mine, as he wants to speak to the workers and live and work amongst them. Does one stand on the sidelines of life and never jump in? Zorba decides to go for a walk, presumably to grieve, and he encounters Manolakas, who wishes to fight Zorba for dishonoring him at the church.
