Jin dai Zhongguo nü zi jiao yu lun zheng shi yan jiu (1895)

He observes that it is especially difficult to assess the possible impact of the economic reforms on gender inequality when comparable baseline data from earlier periods are lacking or are of questionable objectivity. Though trade and business came last, merchants were not always at the bottom of this hierarchy.

Papers had been made available in advance of the conference, so authors limited themselves to short, ten-minute summaries. The more general commentaries of the discussants are provided so that all can benefit from their larger view and insights. Cell 4, unremunerated household-based work, however, seems to have remained primarily the province of women, giving them a kind of twoshift existence Hochschild 1989 similar to those in other industrial countries.

Is it simply to get by like everyone else? She now makes only 100 yuan. He describes the virtual elimination of household-based production in the socialist era, whether compensated or not, and the movement away from a gendered division of labor to an ideological denial of the gendered division of labor—where women were still at a disadvantage because they still had to do those things formerly defined as women's work.

Jin dai Zhongguo nü zi jiao yu lun zheng shi yan jiu (1895)

Universal marriage and childbearing especially bearing sons to continue the patriline, wifely fidelity, filial piety, and ancestor worship were touted and rewarded by the state through government-endowed shrines, imperial certificates of merit, and even cash prizes honoring chaste widows and filial sons. Women are somewhat more involved than men, although the types of volunteer work differ by gender. The Han government also employed slaves, while frequently accusing them of idleness and sloth and of living off the labor and tax revenues supplied by ordinary commoners.

In the debriefing, the moderator wondered about the comprehension level of the mothers in this group. One issue, Wang concludes, is that, compared with urban women who are official residents or official migrants, unofficial migrant women lack the institutional support or intervention that might promote gender equality. Rulers trying to make the people work hard had to be careful that their own demands would not interfere with every household's need to provide for itself.
