The origin and evolution of the Hawaiian honeycreepers (Drepanididae) » Malama Mauna Kea Library Catalog

They forage mostly alone and in family groups, but some species feed in mixed flocks. The entire first half of the book 184 page is introductory material on almost any aspect of the group that might be discussed, including their amazing evolutionary radiation. HABITAT Most Hawaiian honeycreepers live in forests, which range from mostly dry to very wet tropical and semi-tropical climates.

The population is fairly large, with an upper estimate of 5,000, but within a restricted range. In the absence of gene flow from resistant populations, mid-elevation populations remain small. The sexes of many honeycreeper species differ subtly or markedly in colors sexual dichromatism, the males being more vividly and variously colored, the females tending to more, favoring olive-greens and grays, although in some species both sexes have relatively plain rainment.

Hawaiian Honeycreeper lineage Drpanidini

It was formerly classified as a Near Threatened species by the IUCN, but recent research has proven that it was rarer than previously believed.
