The extraordinary complexity of health-care institutions will not disappear. In defense of food: an eater's manifesto. There were, for example, forty-four deaths mostly from typhoid fever and pneumonia among the 910 soldiers treated at a Confederate hospital in Columbus between October 15, 1862, and January 12, 1864.

Other federal funds flowed into Texas during the 1940s for support of an extensive array of medical institutions serving military personnel and veterans and for support of biomedical research at academic institutions. Between 1892 and 1925, twelve private sanatoria for these patients opened in El Paso alone, while fifty beds were also set aside for consumptives at Hotel Dieu between 1894 and 1914. With San Antonio de B  xar as the provincial capital, some 5,000 persons lived on the Spanish Texas frontier at the turn of the nineteenth century.
