McLuhan and Baudrillard: The Masters of Implosion

But implosion, the death of the cybernetic combinatory world, is a constant threat. The system is left constantly trying to exhort people to be responsible subjects while producing them as simple conductors of social power. For Baudrillard, media technology and semiurgy are the demiurges of media practices and effects, separated from their uses by specific economic and political interests, individuals and groups, and the social systems within which they function.

What are the social effects of all these changes? The growing density of simulations is destroying it. For example, he refers to the isolated knowledge and trivia of quiz shows. Baudrillard's theoreticism, however, completely eschews cultural practice and becomes more and more divorced from the political struggles and issues of the day -- though the question of Baudrillard's politics would take another long and very tortured paper to deal with.
