MARSHALL SHEPHERD: You can think of warm ocean water as the fuel supply for these big heat engines in these hurricanes. Over a black screen, subjects speak of their intense, mythic experiences in the desert: A man tells of a fifteen-foot-tall monster said to haunt the region, while a border patrolman spins a similarly bizarre tale of man versus beast.

Henry Tokabak dreams of creating a bank where people can exchange their shell money for cash.

Decoding the Weather Machine

NARRATOR: That record shows temperature swings from warm periods to ice ages triggered by changes in Earth's orbit. From a national security perspective, sea level rise is a threat multiplier or a threat magnifier. STEPHEN RISER: If we put all of that heat into the lower atmosphere, the atmosphere would heat up by about 20 degrees Fahrenheit, that's how much heat we're talking about here.
