4. Addressing persistent and challenging behaviour

Some students with high needs required additional support to develop friendships at school. DELIMITATION OF THE STUDY.....6 7 1.

4. Addressing persistent and challenging behaviour

As part of this response to adolescent students, schools should identify which groups of students are most at risk.

Transition from Primary to Secondary School

Wylie et al 2006 , commenting on vulnerable students in New Zealand, state: There are signs of a growing mismatch and discontent with schools among the lower-income group, and overlapping that to some extent, among attending low-decile schools. Children are looking forward to having more freedom, more challenges, and making new friends. If used in an all-staff training session, the webinar should take about 45-60 minutes to complete, including the suggested activity.

Case study: mix and match

Moving from the world of the known to the unknown: The transition from primary to secondary school. The following is a case study from a co-education secondary school.

4. Addressing persistent and challenging behaviour

Both contextual and universal approaches are pursued to examine differences and commonalities from a global perspective. Ray, a Senco in a larger-than-average inner city secondary school, once showed me reams of papers cataloguing every detail about every provision. What is clear from this example is the extent to which the teachers and leaders had thoughtfully incorporated a pastoral care approach across many systems in the school with the purpose of supporting students to learn and feel a sense of wellbeing.
