In the rest of the Italian peninsula, the fraction of non-European slaves was definitively much lower than that. The number of quaestors was expanded to twenty, so that each senior magistrate at Rome and proconsul and praetor in the provinces had an assistant; and the membership of the senate was expanded to 600, so that there were enough senators to fill the increasing number of posts. The exception to this was the Cisalpine country of northern Italy, which had only been conquered properly in the second century ; this received the Roman citizenship under

Julius Caesar, in the mid-first century.
