London also played a central role in the inland trades: both imported and CONTRASTING LOCALITIES other goods were distributed to all parts of the country from London. I continue to puzzle about this because work published since implies that towns were more important than I found them to be. This would have required no less work or judgement but would rather have encouraged me to be more self-conscious about the approaches that I was using.

This does reflect contemporary perceptions and descriptions; the overall impression given by Defoe and Fiennes, for instance, is that towns were worth visiting, that something interesting would be seen in them, and that they were busy centres of local life.

Second, I collected that data in a manner that meant that I could not use regression analysis for I recorded whether an item was present or not; I did this because it was a more robust way of collecting data. It is also important in characterizing the north-east as a region with very advanced aspects in its economy, especially in the towns, alongside rather backward rural elements. At least one person in six had lived there at some time in their lives, and its population accounted for about a tenth of the population of England in 1700.

output of many industries are seen as completely overshadowing the less dramatic changes of the earlier period.

These questions are the specific subject of later chapters about household behaviour. As far as most middling households were concerned, these styles were of marginal relevance, for much furniture was very simply made and has not been thought worth keeping, so that any changes in appearance cannot be reconstructed. A very large amount written on this subject arises from attempts to explain industrialization in the second half of the eighteenth century,³² although there are
