In April 1915, modern chemical warfare was born on the battlefields of Belgium, and soon became a tolerated although never legalized form of weaponry used by all combatants on a frightening scale. There was at the time constant talk of the persistence of a taboo regarding the sexual violence committed against German women.

Based on the testimony of a number of American officers, Atina Grossmann 1998: 225-6 comes to the conclusion that in the early years of the occupation the Americans showed little surprise or disapproval in relation to the sexual violence committed by the Soviets against German women. German bombers mostly lightly armed twin-engine planes such as the Heinkel He 111 and Junkers Ju 88 lacked the bomb load capacity to strike permanently devastating blows, and they also proved, in daylight, to be easily to the British fighters.
