The screenshot shows a digital document from a database. At the top, it displays the title 'The Potential Effects and Use of Chinese Herbal Medicine Pine Pollen (Pinus pollen): A Bibliometric Analysis of Pharmacological and Clinical Studies'. Below the title is an abstract section. The abstract discusses the results of a study to conduct a comprehensive review of all bibliometric studies to identify the breadth and scope of the pharmacological and clinical effects of pine pollen. It mentions that 11 English and 10 Chinese databases were searched, and 22 English databases were selected for pharmacological and clinical effects on pine pollen. The study found 1111 publications, 1011 of which were in English and 100 in Chinese. The number of publications increased year by year, with 2006 having the most at 277, followed by 2007 with 222, and so on. The study found that pine pollen has a wide range of pharmacological and clinical effects, including anti-oxidative, anti-inflammatory, anti-tumor, anti-diabetic, anti-hypertensive, anti-arrhythmic, anti-epileptic, anti-ulcer, anti-constipation, anti-nausea, anti-emetic, and anti-anxiety properties. It also found that pine pollen can improve memory and cognitive function, and has potential applications in the treatment of various diseases. The study concluded that pine pollen is a promising natural product with great potential for further research and development.
