Fifty Years of Bleeding

A Storytelling Feminist Reading

of Mark 5:24-43

Musa W. Dube Shomanah

This paper is based on three texts: (1) an African oral tale of a young girl who is buried by her friends; (2) a Biblical text of a bleeding woman who had visited many physicians before she found one who could help her; and (3) a study of the past fifty years covering the pre-colonial and colonial periods, the struggle for independence and the post-independence period. The author uses the story of the African girl and the story of the African woman to tell the story of Africa. She highlights the resilience of the African woman and the people of Africa in general, and highlights their will to survive. The author also highlights the power of the African woman and the power of the African people, who she calls "Daubie Cow" ("Little girl, who?") to those who have been brought up to believe that women are weak and powerless. The author uses a method and theories of analysis, it draws on the theories of social location, reading response, and critical theory. The author also uses a method of analysis called "critical reading" to interpret the text according to their social experiences and contexts.
