Questions concerning Liechtenstein during the National Socialist period and the Second World War

Consider, a women in a country that not only lost a lot if its men in a war but where public order has broken down and completely or partially replaced by an armed occupation is talked into intercourse by a member of the occupying army based on the impression he conveys to her that she needs a protector from other soldiers. The Nazi Party of Lichtenstein did try to topple the prince of Lichtenstein in 1939 but was unsuccessful in doing so probably due to the fact that it only had about 25 members. Even within the larger left, they represented a potent but nonetheless a minority.

Because Austrian nationalism and the Austrian nation were not born due to primordial circumstances or perennial language links. Given the lack of complete population statistics this number still has a margin of error that's the reason for the range between 5. In a similar vein, historians who would have had the chance to establish a clearer picture in general through techniques such as interviews with victims did not do so because the issue of sexual violence and the stigma attached to it lead to it being ignored for a very long time by many a historian.
