There has been a growing body of research designed to evaluate the effectiveness of these induction programs.

The importance of induction support for teachers

In particular, how are school districts paying for this? Slightly fewer beginning teachers, about 80%, said they received ongoing guidance and feedback from a mentor teacher.

The importance of induction support for teachers

Note: The major exception to the overall trend was the large randomized controlled trial conducted by Glazerman and colleagues. What we learned is very revealing. Our study looked at just one outcome—retention—which raises several questions.

Support for Beginning Teachers

On the other hand, fewer than 20% of beginning teachers reported receiving a reduced teaching load or schedule to ease their transition—a support that is probably more common for beginning professors in higher education. All of this poses difficulties for those engaged in the very important and very practical matter of deciding which, if any, program or activity to offer in schools. The more comprehensive the induction program, the better the retention.
