Estée Lauder (businesswoman)

She was committed to keeping the company privately owned, avoiding the lucrative temptation of going public. Lauder's claims of descent from European aristocracy were discredited in a biography, Estée Lauder: Beyond the Magic 1985 by , later known for her forgery of letters purportedly written by celebrities; her New York Times obituary observed 'she was a New Yorker and not an aristocrat at all', notwithstanding 'the mythmaking that is so much of the magic of the beauty industry'. She received the in 2004.

Israel leaks no juicy secrets, but tells a slightly more objective tale, albeit with a few snide cracks here and there. Every battle with her competitors, every fight to get in a department store, and every effort to connect with the leaders of society served one purpose: to demonstrate and sell her superior products.
