Clinical Sciences Division

Outcomes: The program has reached students, staff and faculty through over 60 interactive FRESH displays and education sessions. Analysis of variance ANOVA was used to detect differences by rank and gender, and measures of association Pearson correlation coefficients and multiple regression were used to identify factors that affected h-index and PI funding received. Conclusion: Increased nutrition knowledge and an improved food environment could, over the long term, support improved university student health.

Corps professoral

Objectives: The FRESH Food Resources and Education for Student Health peer nutrition education program engages undergraduate and graduate students in experiential learning to improve the campus food and nutrition environment and promote healthy behaviours among university students.
