If the parties can't agree on creating a commission, what's Plan B?

Experts told us there are several fallback options, including:

- A new, select committee of members of Congress with the specific job of investigating Jan. 6.
- A task force run by the Justice Department or a mix of agencies to propose new policies. Such a task force might have an advisory group consisting of the same types of people who might have been appointed to a blue-ribbon commission.
- Democratic congressional leaders could hire an outside investigator.
- The Justice Department could convene a grand jury and appoint a special prosecutor.
- Democrats could continue with the existing decentralized committee reviews and blame Republicans for obstructing the independent commission.
