American Influence
America's media and economic domination since WWII, not to mention its strong military presence in Korea since the Korean War, has led to a massive infiltration of English words and English origin in everyday use in Korean. Words like bendipyon (핸드폰), "mobile phone" (in hand phone), hippi (힙피), "hippie", baengnyeol (방울), "earring", baengnyeo (방울), "back mirror" have made their way into everyday Korean.

'Pure' Korean
Since liberation from the Japanese at the end of WWII, both North and South Korea engaged in manipulation of the Korean language for nationalistic purposes. Foreign words in Korean were at one time discouraged by the South Korean regime of Park Chung-hee, and the teaching of all but the most basic Chinese characters was prohibited for a period of time. In North Korea, virtually nothing is written in Chinese characters, and the North Korean rulers have succeeded in systematically purging foreign words – even Korean words of Chinese origin – with new words composed of 'pure' Korean characters.

A good example can be found in the Korean words for 'ice cream'. Koreans originally referred to it as sakukim (사과김) or chilgukim. However, when the Chinese word was introduced, the Chinese-influenced Korean ruler, after and wiser ruler, headed the creation of a simple script that the masses could easily learn and use. Hangul (lit: Korean letters) was officially adopted in 1446.

WRITTEN KOREAN
Korean was originally written using Chinese characters made up of complex pictographs, many of which only had one sound bite were impossible to decipher. When the Chinese-influenced Korean ruler, headed the creation of a simple script that the masses could easily learn and use. Hangul (lit: Korean letters)
