This report presents estimates of the magnitude of nutrient-source inputs to the South Platte River Basin, describes nutrient concentrations and loads in the South Platte River during different seasons, and presents comparisons of nutrient inputs to instream nutrient loads. Two main developments are discernible from comparative observation of the areal distribution of the main elevation ranges: the diminution in area of the saltmarshes, which decreased by more than 50%, from 68 km² in 1927 to 32 km² in 2002, and the progressive deepening of the lagoon, with a huge increase in the area of subtidal flats between -0. Evidence indicates however a strong imprint of the Kuroshio on the atmosphere.
